Why people are trying to rewrite the financial narrative

The financialization of the economy continues, understanding, creating a bubble in commodities just as it did with houses and office buildings.

They are exempt from all oversight, as they are sovereigns of the capital markets, from financial regulation and, most importantly, regulation that could impose some sort of accountability. The Fed's actions are not unlike those of Goldman Sachs' AIG and WTC's $30 billion in derivatives at the time of the crisis.

They are exempt from all oversight, as they are sovereigns of the capital markets, from financial regulation and, most importantly, regulation that could impose some sort of accountability. The Fed's actions are not unlike those of Goldman Sachs' AIG and WTC's $30 billion in derivatives at the time of the crisis.

They are exempt from all oversight, as they are sovereigns of the capital markets, from financial regulation and, most importantly, regulation that could impose some sort of accountability. The Fed's actions are not unlike those of Goldman Sachs' AIG and WTC's $30 billion in derivatives at the time of the crisis.

They are exempt from all oversight, as they are sovereigns of the capital markets, from financial regulation and, most importantly, regulation that could impose some sort of accountability. The Fed's actions are not unlike those of Goldman Sachs' AIG and WTC's $30 billion in derivatives at the time of the crisis.

They are exempt from all oversight, as they are sovereigns of the capital markets, from financial regulation and, most importantly, regulation that could impose some sort of accountability. The Fed's actions are not unlike those of Goldman Sachs' AIG and WTC's $30 billion in derivatives at the time of the crisis.

They are exempt from all oversight, as they are sovereigns of the capital markets, from financial regulation and, most importantly, regulation that could impose some sort of accountability. The Fed's actions are not unlike those of Goldman Sachs' AIG and WTC's $30 billion in derivatives at the time of the crisis.

They are exempt from all oversight, as they are sovereigns of the capital markets, from financial regulation and, most importantly, regulation that could impose some sort of accountability. The Fed's actions are not unlike those of Goldman Sachs' AIG and WTC's $30 billion in derivatives at the time of the crisis.

They are exempt from all oversight, as they are sovereigns of the capital markets, from financial regulation and, most importantly, regulation that could impose some sort of accountability. The Fed's actions are not unlike those of Goldman Sachs' AIG and WTC's $30 billion in derivatives at the time of the crisis.